Strange, Rare and Peculiar:
Aborigines, Benedictines and Homeopathy

by Francis Treuherz MA RSHom FSHom

Preamble

Julian Winston, in his erudite and entertaining history of homeopathy, referred to Bishop Rosendo Salvado who reputedly treated Aboriginals with homeopathy in 1857, in Western Australia.1 This was possibly the earliest use of homeopathy in Australia. Julian could not recall where he read this.2 What follows is an account of an attempt to discover the origins of this story.

Hypothesis

Homeopaths have a phrase for what is most useful in the study of materia medica, and so also in the study of patients in an effort to help them, ‘strange, rare and peculiar’.3 The clues to a cure lie in what are uncommon and characteristic in both the properties of the medicine and the symptoms of the patient. To have worked as a homeopath with aboriginal people in the mid nineteenth century in Australia is uncommon, indeed strange, rare and peculiar; and I assumed that if I searched hard enough I should find some interesting case studies of patients treated at this time by Salvado.4

Discovery: New Norcia

What I discovered was to me fascinating, but it was not, alas, case studies, so this is a description of a nil result, which might still be of some small interest.

There is a wealth of biography and hagiography about Rosendo Salvado (1814-1903).5 He was a Benedictine priest from Spain. He had studied in Italy, and was a man of wide European culture, not just a cloistered monk. He came to Australia after a short stay in England including a visit to the monastery near Bath at Downside, with a party which included English and Irish as well as Spanish and Italian clergy. He suffered many privations and hardships, but together with valued colleagues, he succeeded in founding a monastery, a pastoral and agricultural community and schools in the Victoria Plains, in the interior of Western Australia north east of Perth. His achievements were more than the founding of these institutions. He took care to import the artefacts and ideas of high and enlightened European culture. The small town still stands, with a monastery, a museum, library, art gallery, with schools (now closed and used for conferences or to store archives), and a hotel. A roadhouse attracts travellers and tourists. In order to raise funds for his mission he organised a piano concert in the largest hall of Perth in 1847, which was a huge success, uniting Protestant, Catholic and Jew in support of his work. He himself was the pianist showing himself to be a virtuoso performer.6 He invited his brother to come from Europe to help him; his brother was a photographer so a pictorial record exists to add a dimension to the extensive archives.

He persuaded friends to donate paintings, including a Murillo; there is still a most impressive collection of minor Italian old masters, all the more so for being conserved and open to public view in the middle of an Australian desert, both climatic, and cultural at that time.7 He imported books, both secular and ecclesiastic, it was his ambition that there should be a substantial library of all that was best of European literature available for his community. He embraced such technology as was relevant to pastoral agriculture, whether animal husbandry, bread baking or wine making and distilling. The products of the community were a commercial success, achieving high prices for example in the London wool markets.

He claimed not to know anything of medicine, ‘we were completely ignorant of medicine’10 and managed to secure the services of a Father Coll who, although not qualified in medicine, had trained and was apparently knowledgeable. Until then they used olive oil, tea, rice soup, and Epsom salts.11 An outbreak in 1848, of what may have been syphilis (it is referred to only by euphemism), was cured only after asking for advice from a medical man in the city.12 A sick young boy was even taken to Italy to be cured there, (the name of the illness is not mentioned).13 This may of course simply mean that any knowledge of homeopathy was acquired after 1851 when these memoirs were written. It has been reported that Salvado corresponded with Florence Nightingale on the subject of contagious diseases.14 Bidde suggests that a Spanish speaking homeopath may discover more material in the latter personal diaries of Salvado and in the archives.15 The archives have a reference to Rosendo Salvado’s brother Fr Santos Salvado who did not trust homeopathy and had a tendency to scoff at Salvado.16

Coll arrived in 1860 and soon gained a positive reputation both in New Norcia and in the surrounding areas. At this time the Aboriginals only had the services of untutored monks, or native healers, whom Salvado considered weird charlatans.17 There had been traumatic epidemics of both measles and whooping cough with apparently few therapeutic modalities, other than nursing care, available to the community.18

All of this may, in terms of modern political correctness, appear to be some sort of patronising colonial plot, especially as of course there was also the objective of a mission to convert the Aboriginals to Christianity. But most of all Salvado embraced and appreciated the Aboriginals. From the very first exploration on foot into the outback he learned their language, and his memoirs include an appendix of an Aboriginal language glossary. His papers show that he could converse with them in their own tongue. He took care not to break up tribal cultures and relationships, so that New Norcia would not deliberately seek out people from too far away but set up some small satellite missions to be close to indigenous peoples at their own locations. He defended their rights with some success with the local authorities. Ronald Berndt, professor of anthropology at the University of Western Australia characterised Salvado as a man of and before his time. From his memoirs Salvado emerges as a great humanist.1

Homeopathy: the Library

There are 19 homeopathic titles in the library,26 some of them multi-volume sets bringing the total to 28, of which only one is 20th century.27 They are in English, French Italian and Spanish. One has Salvado’s signature. One is marked as being in a special Salvado collection. Therefore we know that he was aware of homeopathy. I found no evidence at all that Salvado or Coll actually practised homeopathy. Someone did. It may or may not have been them.

There is a spread of dates in the collection from 1833 through to the late 19th century so it is possible that the books were acquired at different times, perhaps during one of Salvado’s voyages to Europe. An assiduous researcher may find that there are invoices for book purchases, or the books may have been procured by Salvado on one of his European voyages or brought by other travellers to order.

Until I arrived and examined the collection in detail not all of the homeopathic books were correctly identified and catalogued, and the Organon appeared to have been lost but we found it. These books are a valuable and rare collection in themselves. I doubt very much that there are any comparable books elsewhere in Australia. They are in good condition. (I augmented the collection with a gift.) But their existence demonstrates that Salvado considered homeopathy to be of sufficiently high status intellectually or culturally to be worthy of inclusion in the library. Not only does the collection comprise first aid manuals, but also includes an early edition of the Organon of Samuel Hahnemann, the foundation textbook of homeopathic medicine.

Salvado and his agent in London, Charles Wainwright of High Holborn. Salvado orders “a case of homeopathic medicines and some more books about it”. In the reply Wainwright comments on the high prices New Norcia wool is fetching and confirms that the order for medicines is in hand.

Discussion

There are a number of issues to discuss here.

A historian of medicine in Australia, Philippa Marty, has noted that in 1894 there was at least one physician and 2 homeopathic pharmacies in Perth, Martin of Hay Street and Wiggs of Murray Street.22 This is of course later than these letters, but it does show that homeopathy was available in Perth. That the local branch of the BMA banned homeopathies from medical registration suggests that the medical profession feared their competition. Although none of the 18 homepaths listed in Australia at that time were actually in Perth. “It is difficult to trace the extent of homeopathic usage in Western Australia” writes Marty, “partly because much homeopathic treatment was self-administered. The ready availability of homeopathic chests with instructions on treatment left much prescribing in the hands of the patient…”. For this scenario the Hering book is both the first in the English language, and the archetype. Hering originally wrote notes on first aid for missionaries in Surinam in the 1820s, and this he expanded in a book published in Pennsylvania in 1828. It has remained in print ever since.

As white settlers occupied more and more of North America in the 19th century without sufficient doctors they took their chests and their Hering with them. Harris Coulter has described the importance of medicine chests and kits in the spread and acceptance of homeopathy, the usage, range of these kits by women and lay prescribers, and the fear that this aroused in the medical profession.24 A historian of alternative medicine in America, John Haller more recently refers to lay practitioners as ‘lay doctors’, devoting a whole chapter to their work, regarded as most important in the survival of homeopathy.25 Only Ruddock’s Vademecum26 in England rivalled Hering, and chests were made with a slot for the book. Ruddock was even reprinted in Melbourne for chests made in England and rebadged with Martin and Pleasance or Gould of Melbourne or Collins of Sydney.

Throughout the history of homeopathy pharmacies have prepared kits for lay prescribers, for home use and for travellers. These kits may be seen in the advertisements at the end of 19th century books, in journals and magazines for lay homeopaths, and in museums. For example the Hull Maritime Museum (in NE England) has a kit for seafarers. The University of Oxford museum of the history of science has a domestic kit. Kirkstall Abbey (West Yorkshire) museum of local social history has some fine examples. It has been reported that many of those who came to Australia for the gold rush brought chests with them from England, France and Germany. There is a German chest in the New Norcia museum. Communication and travel over long distances between the Australian states was not easy, we can only observe that most of the medicines in the New Norcia museum came from London.

It is not known why Salvado bought his medicines from London, except that he had an agent there and friends at Downside. Homeopathic pharmacies with a good reputation existed in all the major Australian cities, but we do not know when the first need arose for remedies for New Norcia, and the Australian pharmacies also had recourse to London for their supplies. There was at least one self-help manual published in Australia, the quality named miniature booklet, ‘Medical Telephone’. This was not in the library at New Norcia. It was a first aid guide covering advice for preservation of health, nursing and feeding, dealing with wounds and fractures, and treatment of disease. Evidently it was produced to promote the services of the (still extant) Hobart pharmacy with much of material on homeopathic medicines and their use.

Allopathic medicine and healing were often practiced by priests of all denominations, especially where there were not enough doctors in the 19th century, and it was with homeopathy. There was extensive homeopathic work by ministers and missionaries. Many of the Swedenborgians who practiced homeopathy in 19th century America, especially on the Eastern seaboard were ministers. As there was a shortage of medical doctors, and the legislation for medical registration was not fully enforced, the Christian clergy also practised medicine in Australia. Homeopathy was practised not only by Salvado but by Reverend Benjamin Wilson, a pioneer of homeopathy in Queensland, Reverend C Schuhknecht practiced homeopathy both in Mount Gambier, South Australia, and Natmul, Victoria. Reverend George Wilkinson of Williamstown ‘combined the cause of temperance with the practice of homeopathy’. But their focus was not so extensively on the Aboriginals as at New Norcia, expressly created as a mission. On the other hand medical care for settlers was also sometimes provided by Father Coll. In China A Gladstone Clarke, a Christian missionary in 1925 published a small reference book for lay prescribers which is still in print. This had the support of a medical doctor Edwin Neatby, who wrote the introduction, and himself wrote a manual for missionaries. Homeopathy practised by missionaries trained in London as lay prescribers, continued throughout the 20th century.

Melbourne, Sydney, and Tasmania (Launceston and Hobart) had homeopathic hospitals. There is a scholarly institutional history of the Melbourne hospital, shorter pamphlets about Tasmania.

Without more recourse to original sources this work is unfinished, and like other modern essays on this subject, all that remains is the possibility that further research will uncover more evidence, about Salvado and New Norcia, and about the details of early homeopathy in Australia. This is not intended to be the definitive story of homeopathy in Australia. It does suggest that more of us should investigate the history of homeopathy where and when we take a holiday.

The work of lay prescribers who care for their family and friends continued into the 20th and continues into the 21st centuries. There is a growing demand for first aid kits, for example for family use, for travellers, for childbirth. Helios Homeopathic Pharmacy of Tunbridge Wells reports a 17% growth in sales of kits over a 10 year period from 1995 to 2005. Contemporary magazines like Homeopathy Today (USA) and Health and Homeopathy (UK) carry display advertisements for kits. Owen Homeopathics of Mount Lawley close to Perth in Western Australia sells remedy kits online.

This story adds something to our knowledge of lay homeopathy, of the importance of home medicine chests and the self taught practitioner, as distinct from the physician, and the modern professional homeopath.

Acknowledgements

The reason for my visit to Perth and my interest in this story was personal: early in 2003 my daughter was to be married in Perth, Western Australia and I travelled there for the wedding. I owe a great deal to the practical help and kindness of the staff at New Norcia, especially Sue Johnson, the librarian, Wendy G McKinley archivist, and Jenny Waddell, Manager Visitor Services.

Francis Treuherz MA RSHom FSHom 2 Exeter Road, side entrance, London NW248P: +44 (0) 208 450 6664 fran@gn.cpc.org

21 Jahr GHG. Nouveau manuel de medicine homoeopathique premiere partie manuel de matiere medicale ou resum des principaux effets des medicaments homoeopathiques avec indication des observations cliniques 1. (hardback) - 6th. - Paris: J.B Bailliere, 1855.

22 Jahr GHG. Nouveau manuel de medicine homoeopathique seconde partie repertoire therapeutique et symptomatologique ou tables alphabétiques des principaux symptomes des medicaments homoeopathiques avec indication es avis cliniques. - vol.2. (hardback) - 5th. - Paris: J.B Bailliere, 1850. - Index; 808p. - signed by Salvado*

26 Ruddock EH. The homoeopathic vade

References

1. Winston J. The Faces of Homeopathy. Iowa: Great Auk Publishing 1999, 563. This book is like a troubadour’s version of the history of homeopathy around the world, full of wonderful stories. The introduction was written by the man who wrote the most scholarly history of homeopathy, Harris Coulter, and it was the last thing Coulter wrote before he was incapacitated by a stroke. Winston puts the date in 1857, other sources state 1846.

2. Winston J. History of homeopathy writing in New Zealand, personal communication.

3. Boeckh, Baron C.F.M. von. Therapeutic Pocket Book for Homeopathic Physicians to be used at the bedside of the Patient and in studying the Materia Medica Plura. Munster: Coppenrath, 1846.

4. When I acquired Frederick Dearborn’s Homeopathy in the World War (Chicago: American Institute of Homeopathy 1923.) I assessed I should read some interesting case studies, I was disappointed. The book discusses the politics of enlisting homeopathic physicians and nurses in the US war effort and their subsequent deployment, with lists and photographs, there was no homeopathy.

5. On the other hand in Marmaudle Sampson’s Progress of homeopathy: a series of papers illustrative of the position and prospects of medical science. (London: Samuel Highley for the English Homeopathic Association 1847) there is a full report and a practice audit by Dr. Joseph Kidd of his work in the famine in Ireland with the names of all his patients, remedies prescribed and some illustrative case studies.

13. Hutchinson 1977, 33-44

15. Ibid. 50.

16. Ibid. 77.

17. Ibid. 95-96.

18. Russo librarian at New Norcia, personal communication.

23. Biddle, 1999, identified only 9 homeopathy titles in the library.

24. See appendix.

25. Headland published books by Chepmei, Curie, Hahnemann, Hartlaub, Henderson, Hering, Jahr, Mander; and sold single medicines and kits.

32. http://www.leeds.ac.uk/encyclopedia/default.asp

34. The Medical Telephone, Hobart: Guild Homeopathic Pharmacy 1883.

36. Treuhaus F. The origins of Kent’s homeopathy; the influence of Swedenborg. Journal of the American Institute of Homeopathy 1984; 77:4. See also Haller, co-cit, on other denominations.

41. A Gladstone Clarke; Decachords A Concise Guide to the Homopathic Materia Medica for students of the Missionary School of Medicine and others, Shantung Chefoo China, Missionary School of Medicine, 1925. Introduction by Dr E A Neatby.

43. Price, P. Touching the ends of the earth. The story of the Missionary School of Medicine 1903 – 2003, Missionary School of Medicine, Ware, Herts, 2003.

46. Stephen S. A practical view of homeopathy being an address to British practitioners on the general applicability and superior efficacy of the homoeopathic method in the treatment of disease with cases; London: JB Balliere 1836. (This book has been reprinted: Brighton MA: Elborn Classics.

47. Gill J. The story of the Launceston Homeopathic Hospital, Launceston: Homepun 1990.

49. Baker, A. Pioneer homeopaths in colonial Tasmania, the early days, Simila 1420 nd. np. (Australia).

55. John Morgan MSc, MRPharmS, BSHom, personal communication.